SYNOPSIS (Not for Publication)

Samuel C. Adams, of New York, and his beautiful daughter, Dorothy, heiress to about $10,000,000, sail for England. Dorothy, pursued by a choice collection of lounge lizards because of her wealth, disguises herself on entering England.

She meets young Count Paul Menford who, although ignorant of her identity, is smitten by her charms which even an old-maidish make-up cannot disguise. Paul, posing as a doctor, joins the throng of medical experts called in by Dorothy's father to relieve her nervous distress. Dorothy takes a fancy to Paul and insists that he is just the doctor for her.

Paul, because of his debts, is in the clutches of Joe Diamond, a money-lender. Diamond tells Paul that an American heiress worth $10,000,000 is in London incognito. Paul, in order to get another 500 pound loan agrees to give Diamond twenty percent of the heiress' fortune in the event that Paul marries her.

Dorothy's father buys Paul's family castle from Diamond, although Paul is not aware of it. After a night at the club Paul motors to his castle and, unable to get in through the front door, climbs up to his bedroom on a ladder. He finds Dorothy in his bed. Dorothy screams and there is wild excitement. Explanations take up the better part of the night.

Next morning Dorothy and Paul have breakfast in the garden. Prince George, Paul's friend, comes to visit him and in order not to compromise Dorothy, Paul introduces Dorothy as his wife. The butler overhears the news, tells all the villagers and a newspaper reporter.

Dorothy's father and Diamond, both read the news of Dorothy's marriage. Mr. Adams comes down to help the couple celebrate while Diamond arrives to collect his twenty percent.

Paul tries to explain the situation to Dorothy's father but he will not believe Paul's story and insists that the young couple spend their honeymoon together. Celebrations take place all day. That night, Dorothy's dad, finally convinced that Paul and Dorothy are not married, sends for the village vicar. The latter arrives about the same time as Joe Diamond. While Diamond and Paul are talking Dorothy enters just in time to hear Diamond shouting:

"Didn't you agree to give me twenty percent of all the money you got from this girl when you married her? And didn't you sell this castle in order to keep it in the family by your marriage?"

Dorothy is heartbroken and Paul is shamed beyond measure. Dorothy refuses to listen to Paul's explanations and asks him to leave the castle at once.

Dad Adams, however, comes to the rescue, and signs Dorothy's name to a note inviting Paul to return. When Paul comes back Dad dismisses all the automobiles, breaks the telephone connections and locks Dorothy and Paul in a room together. When Paul finally sees that he is trapped and that Dorothy is ready to forgive him he makes a clean breast of everything and all ends happily as Dad had planned.
